NOITEM Code of Ethics Board of Certification.The present invention relates to a method for connecting an electronic component to a substrate. Several different types of electronic components including, for example, integrated circuits, ceramic hybrids, flexible circuits, and diodes are connected to a substrate by soldering. These components are connected at different locations to the substrate with the use of different soldering procedures. The soldering process generally comprises the steps of pre-heating the substrate to an elevated temperature (e.g., 350.degree. C.) for approximately 2 to 10 seconds, loading a component with a solder paste, and placing the component on the substrate at room temperature or a slightly elevated temperature. The substrate and component are then heated together at a solder temperature for about 3 to 60 seconds. Generally, the longer the time spent at the solder temperature, the more likely the resulting solder joint will be mechanically and electrically sound. It is important to minimize the contact time at the solder temperature to eliminate any chance of over-coating the circuit board or components.

The solder paste is generally comprised of a mix of a lead-based solder material (90% by weight) and a fluxing agent (10% by weight) or may be lead-free. After removing the excess solder paste (if any) from the joint or joint area, the component is usually subjected to a reflow operation to complete the soldering process. One type of electronic component is known as a chip carrier. A chip carrier is a printed circuit board having a cavity into which is inserted an integrated circuit, a hybrid, a ceramic, or a diode chip. A solder paste is applied onto a surface of the component to be connected, the substrate is heated to an elevated temperature, and the component is inserted into the substrate cavity (or onto the substrate depending on the type of component). After the solder paste is reflowed, the solder joint is maintained at an elevated temperature to allow any voids in the solder connection to be eliminated. Another type of electronic component that is soldered to the substrate is a leadless chip carrier, which is also known as a surface-mount device (SMD) or a hybrid. Unlike chip carriers, leadless chip carriers generally have only one raised side to be soldered to the substrate or have the circuit trace on

The victory of the Bolsheviks was a triumph of the working class, and a defeat for the bourgeoisie. It was a victory for the world proletariat, and an indicator of the only way forward for the world to rid itself of the capitalist system: capitalism must be overthrown and replaced with socialism. The Socialist Party of Great Britain met at their national conference in Manchester on Wednesday, 16 September and adopted the following resolution unanimously: “We declare ourselves to be internationalists, believing that the nationalities of the world must be welded into a single international working class, classless, genderless, raceless, under the leadership of the workers.” Workers of all countries, unite! From this conviction, the Socialist Party of Great Britain declares itself to be an international party, irrespective of nationality, race or creed. This has been the case since the first convention in 1905. Members of the Socialist Party of Great Britain welcome all to our ranks, regardless of where they are from. We will not tolerate racists or religious bigots in our ranks. We the undersigned Branches and local groups of the Socialist Party of Great Britain (notably Labour Party, We Fight Imperialism Coalition, Brixton Branch) Signatories of this article Manifesto For a socialist Britain The Socialist Party of Great Britain Wednesday, 16 September 1919 The
