Wireless network providers (e.g., operators) have struggled to keep pace with wireless data traffic growth and provide reliable high-quality service to customers. To try and meet such demand, a wireless network provider may attempt to increase their wireless infrastructure, such as equipment and network capacity. An increase in a provider's infrastructure may increase the access of customers to the provider's service, but it may also require a provider to increase their wireless charges and/or decrease their customer base. As a result, the wireless provider may not be able to recoup their increased infrastructure costs. Some systems enable communication between mobile stations and a fixed side of a wireless communication network by providing for the mobile stations to communicate with a base station in an area that otherwise would not be accessible to the mobile stations. As such, a network provider that has deployed such a system may be able to increase the service area of such a system in order to increase the amount of wireless service that can be provided to customers. Further, in some instances wireless communication networks may be deployed where there are frequent changes in the location of customer premises equipment (e.g., wireless devices). As such, network operators may desire to monitor and/or control such equipment to ensure that the equipment is operating as expected and is within the network's service area. Such deployment may be in areas where network infrastructure is sparse or even non-existent. As such, in order to ensure that a particular customer's equipment is within a customer's service area, there may be a need for the network provider to be able to automatically identify customer premises equipment within a particular area that is not otherwise accessible to the network (e.g., a home, business, etc.). As such, there is a need for a method or system for being able to identify customer premises equipment that is not within a network's coverage area and/or to establish a local area network (LAN) connection with the customer premises equipment. Q: Can I use an analog mains wiring diagram to replace it with the newer X2 wiring? I have a 24v/220v timer. It is in
