elite athletes. The aim of the present study was to compare circulating basal cortisol levels and profiles of cortisol response to high-intensity exercise in athletes with high- and low-chronic high-intensity exercise exposure. Eighteen highly trained male athletes participated in the study. Fifteen of them were professional athletes, while the other three were recreational athletes. Athletes were divided into two groups: one group consisted of athletes who had engaged in high-intensity training for at least 2 years and the other group included athletes who had engaged in high-intensity training for less than 3 months (3-month group). The determination of circulating basal cortisol levels and cortisol profiles in response to exercise was performed in all athletes before and after 30 minutes of ergospirometric exercise. During the post-exercise period, the serum cortisol levels of the professional athletes (HR group) were significantly lower than the serum cortisol levels of the recreational athletes (HR group) (p
