Maxsea Timezero Plot .Q: What is the best practice for testing components in a Redux app We've recently been developing our app with React/Redux. Along the way we've come up with a few questions regarding testing in Redux applications. Testing for valid state in reducers Developing assertions for components When should you test a page? We've been following Robert Martin's test/test-utils which has been working pretty well for us so far. Reducers With Redux, we typically construct a reducer using thunks. A thunk is function that first returns a value and then returns the result of that value through a callback. As the value is only available in the callback, we find that it's easy to write an assertion to test for state that contains a value and pass the thunk into the test function. As an example, we'd expect to see following state in a reducer: { foo: 'bar', bar: 5, } If the reducer needs to modify the foo value it can use a thunk to first return the modified value (i.e. the foo value in the below snippet) and then return that to the callback: function reducer(state, action){ // the code below shows a function that could handle an action // that effects a change in the foo state value let newFoo ='spam'; let newBar = 2; return { ...state, foo: newFoo, bar: newBar, } } As an example, if I wanted to test that the reducer is updating the foo value we'd construct a function that passes the thunk to the reducer's callback and then assert that the reducer has the desired value after: (() => { let newFoo
